

How To Measure for Plantation Shutters

How To Measure for Plantation Shutters? If you are considering installing shutters in your home and only ordering your plantation shutters from Blinds2u, Knowing How To Measure for Plantation Shutters the fine art New house or older, do not assume that each window will measure exactly the same. It is important that each individual window is measured separately, taking into account any slight variations. Knowing how to measure for plantation shutters is a fine art and must be done precisely. Having already decided on the style and finish of your plantation shutters, start by having to hand a pencil, notepad and a well-marked, clean, quality metal tape measure.

For normal recessed windows or full-length ones such as French doors, firstly measure the exact size of the recess including the height and width from three different places, to check for uniformity. You will need to decide exactly where you want your plantation shutters to sit within the recess and mark this in pencil as this is where you will measure from. Then select your frame or mounting options, which can either be an 'L' or a 'Z' frame, depending on where the shutters will sit.

Measuring for shutters correctly requires a minimum clearance check

Knowing how to measure for plantation shutters on sash windows is crucial as the measurements need to be precise. Start by measuring the width from architrave to architrave followed by the exact height from the architrave to the top of the sill, then select the most suitable mounting options. Always remember to allow clearance for pulleys and handles when deciding where to place your shutters. Knowing how to measure for plantation shutters correctly requires a minimum clearance check, so ensure that there is a minimum separation depth of 3.81cm from the back of the plantation shutter to the window or window hardware, this will then allow for both the window and the plantation shutter to operate properly.

You do not have to measure for shutters. We can come out and do this service for you as long as you live in the greater Dublin area.
